It's the one I'd pick for the whole project: it handles long documents with consistent structure, writes sharp social critique without turning into a pamphlet, and works directly on the repo files when you need the scripts. One tool, start to finish.

The catch: it won't give you the local data that makes the project credible basket prices in Quito, which neighborhoods concentrate diabetes, what Ecuador actually subsidizes. That comes from FAO, OPS, and the national statistics institute, not from any model.
